

I received a message on behalf of the Indiana State Attorney General, concerning an FCC proposal which could affect the privacy protection I currently enjoy under Indiana's Telephone Privacy law. Before enactment of the Indiana Law, our household, with two phone lines, constantly recieved unwanted telemarketing calls on both lines, from early morning until late evening. It has never been my policy to purchase any sort of product or service from a telemarketer, and these calls disrupted my family's life on a regular basis, only to have my wife or myself have to cut off the person. Since the Indiana law was enacted, I have not received a single unauthorized telemarketing call from any company. This has been a welcome relief to my family, and is a wonderful example of an effective state law, working on behalf of its constituents. I urge you to please reconsider any law that may dilute this popular and effective state legislation. Thank you in advance for considering my comments as you develop your proposal
